INDIAN GOVERNMENT.—The Standard thinks the true lesson to be gathered from our experiments in governing India is apt to be overlooked by those who confound the English eviscem with the English principle of rule. The English system is false, cumbrous, complicated, unsuitable to the character of the people, and very often oppressive in its effects. The English principle, as administered in the native way—that is, in the primitive, untand, simple way, not peculiar to the unives of India, but eneval with society itself, and of universal prevalence—is cound, Just, and always successful. Lord Granborne was near the mark on Friday night when he suggested that this true principle of Indian rule was despotism; and that the fault has been that the despotic power in India has been too much hampered by regulations. Government in India cannot he too shople, direct, and personal. A mild, patriardial despotism, based on the principle which all Asiation are quick to appreciate—justice—is the true system of government for India; but it is a system which is only to be safely administered by Englishmen. All our greatest triumphs of government in India—such as the government of Scindo by Napier, of the Punjaub by, the Lawrences of Mysors by Mark Cubbon, of the Bheels by Outram, of Busathan by Tod, of the Rajpoor States by Henry Lawrence, of the Coles by Macpherson—have been wen in the practice of the bind of despotium. In every instance of ---Macpherson -have been won in the practice of this kind of despotism. In every instance of failure the failure has happened through overlogislation and a too minute and intricate eye-tein, which the natives are atterly anable to understand or to value.
